

HEALTH WISD GREENVILLE RANCHERIA

In 1850, the U.S. government was determined to settle land claims and end the violence between Americans and California's Native peoples. Between 1851 and 1852, the U.S. and numerous tribes signed treaties, which established reserved lands for bands and tribal occupancy. The connection between the Greenville Maidu and the City of Red Bluff was formally established with the signing of treaties in 1851. The City of Red Bluff sits at the confluence of territorial boundaries. The fact that the city was built where the boundaries from three different treaty areas meet suggests that Red Bluff may have been an established gathering site for Maidu and Wintu tribes, and recognized as such by the 1851 treaties. Unfortunately, under pressure from California lawmakers, the U.S. Senate never ratified the treaties, which remained hidden from the public until 1905.

The Greenville Rancheria is a federally recognized sovereign Indian Nation with approximately 145 Tribal members. It was established by the Supreme Court case, Tillie Hardwick vs. U.S.A. (Dec. 22, 1983), and is able to exercise powers and responsibilities provided under the Indian Reorganization Act (June 18, 1934), and Public Law 93-638. The governing body of the Greenville Rancheria consists of the elected members of the Tribal Council. The Tribal Council, members of which serve four-year terms, consists of Tribal Chairman, Vice Tribal Chairwoman, two Representatives and a Secretary/Representatives, and is responsible for all Tribal policies and procedures in accordance with the Greenville Rancheria's constitution and applicable local, state and federal laws.

Greenville Rancheria provides many services to the communities in Plumas and Tehama Counties. All members of the community, Indian and non-Indian, are welcome. We see "all"!
